Professor Cook's New Book.

One of the latest volumes published by any member of the Yale faculty has recently appeared in Germany. It was published in October by Max Niemeyer of Halle, who is well known for the high quality of the works in modern philology which he issues. This book is entitled, "A Glossary of the Old Northumbrian Gospels," its author being Professor Albert S. Cook. It is rather a large octavo consisting of 263 pages besides the preface. The Lindisfarne Gospels, sometimes called the Durham book, constitute the most important specimen of the old Northumbrian dialect which has been preserved. This dialect evinced greater progress than the other two, West Saxon and Mercian, in its advance towards modern English. This coupled with the fact that most of the old English poetry was, as it is believed, originally composed in this dialect, renders the investigation of its forms a matter of great importance. The material for this investigation is largely contained in Professor Cook's book, in which are given the occurrences of all the words contained in these gospels, besides a Latin Northumbrian index. The author states in his preface that the task has been one of unusual difficulty, and also that he expects to publish an outline of Northumbrian grammar, based upon the forms here given. The volume is dedicated to Professor Sievers of Leipzig.

TIMES MAY CHANGE.

A Street Car Engagement for Fourteen Years Hence.

[From the Detroit Free Press.]
"Fourteen years ago," he began, as the conductor of a Michigan avenue car came in for his fare, "fourteen years ago I was in Detroit and took a ride in this same line and in this same car and you were the conductor who came for my fare."

"Fare, please," said the conductor. "I had been the victim of a misfortune. I was dead broke. I could not even raise a nickel to pay my fare. When I told you as much and threw myself on your generosity, what did you do?"

"Fare, sir!"

"Ah! I remember as if it were but yesterday," continued the man, as a broad smile crept over his face.

"I want your fare, sir!" exclaimed the annoyed conductor.

"Yes, just as you wanted it then; and again I throw myself on your generosity."

"Either pay your fare or get off!"

"Just as you told me fourteen years ago—same voice—same expression of countenance. It is hard to realize that even a week has elapsed."

"Will you pay?"

"No—no pay. I couldn't if I wanted to. I'll get off and try and get a lift on a butcher cart or a wood wagon. Think of it!"

"Yes, I think you belong to the order of dead beats," replied the conductor, as he stopped the car.

"Fourteen years have elapsed—same line—same car—same conductor—same struggle with misfortune. Say, of this corner at half-past two p. m., and I hope by that time to have a nickel. Two bells—let 'er go—ta, ta!"

A Prompt Reply.

"I hear you are engaged to be married to a young lady in San Francisco," remarked a Tribune reporter to a well-known young man of Walnut Hills.

"Yes, the rumor is true."

"Let me congratulate you. I don't know her, but I am sure that you could make nothing but a wise choice."

"By the way, if you will promise not to tell this I will let you know a funny incident about my engagement."

The promise being given he went on and related the following:

"I was on the point of asking the question several times, but somehow I thought she would refuse me, so the last day I was out there I managed to summon up enough courage to pop. She told me to give her time. I told her that I must leave that night, and would she tell me then? She said she would consider. I left her without an answer, and as none came for a week I could stand it no longer, so, stepping into a telephone office on my way home about six o'clock one evening, sent her the following message: 'Please tell me. Is the answer yes or no?'"

"About ten o'clock the reply came, 'Yes.'"

"Of course I was happy and all that, but on reading the telegram for the hundredth time I noticed that it was filed at four in the afternoon. For a moment I was staggered, but I soon thought of the reason. It was the difference in time between Cincinnati and San Francisco. I could not help laughing when I thought that I was engaged before I had even asked the question."
